

First Question: Why does anyone care about saving anyone?

First Answer: Whether or not one believes it, people all around the world are connected by some manner, whether it be political, environmental, familial, business related, etc. The fact that each and every human on Earth has some impact on the Earth, no matter how small the impact may be, means each and every human affects one another. The fact that teenagers in Japan pick up on new trends affects the coming and going of fads here in America. The fact that people in California are using up more water nowadays due to rising temperatures affects people in Colorado, the place where a lot of California's fresh water comes from. I personally believe in karma and what goes around does come around. Care about people in other parts of the world and they will care about you; neglect them, and they will neglect you. It's a simple golden rule to follow that many have yet to learn.

Second Question: What's in it for me?

Second Answer: A LOT. The expansion of cultures, people, business, economy, and so many more things can be obtainable through preserving human rights and aiding those across the world.
