

When one thinks of love, he or she first thinks of the feelings shared between a boy and a girl. One of the most valuable experiences one can gain from volunteer work is a new take on what people believe constitutes as true love. There are so many types of love, including the love in family, in friendships, or in any relationship one can see in everyday life. One of the most touching things is the sight of two new friends holding hands. Even the sight of an older child looking after their younger friends at a summer camp can be seen as love. It is this feeling that lies as the foundation of any type of love. Some of the strongest bonds are those between siblings. Bound by blood, their commitment to each other surpasses those of many relationships. In times of difficulty, there seems like no reason to help someone else, especially when the person himself is softening. However, all it takes is a little love to realize that helping one another is universal. Anyone can feel it, and if everyone shares their love. Everyone will feel it.