

Love is one of the most powerful emotions that humans experience. Through it, we are capable of going beyond our normal limits and complete what others would call miracles. Love lets us loosen ourselves from the confines of society and allows us to be ourselves.

In addition, love is often seen as the universal solution. If everyone on the world could just love each other, the world would become such a better place. There would be no need for war, no need for hatred. All that would remain would be the pure love that would surround everyone, which would push them to help others in need and not as fortunate as they. If everyone could love each other, we would have true peace in the world, not like the “surface” peace we have in some areas of the world. With love, nobody would want to get into fights and knowingly hurt others, and thus, a universal peace would form.

Love is expressed through many forms. It can be the love between parents and children, the love between siblings, the love of good friends, anything. As long as there is a slight positive connection between people, love will be there. If everyone experienced this love and became friends with many more people, think of how much better this world could be. Think about it. How would you feel if you knew that others loved you, cared for you, as much as you cared for them. How would the bond affect you? What if one of your old enemies came up to you and asked to be friends? Would you still want to hurt them, attack them, knowing that they have changed and is asking for your love?

Love is one of the most important aspects that humans rely on. It is through our parents loved that we grow up, through our friends’ love that we are not solitary, etc. it is love that makes us human and love that rules our life. If everyone could experience it and widen their network of loved people, the world would be a much better place.
