Chelsea Chen

Palo Alto High School / Grade 10

Chelsea Chen86@gmail.com

No Hatred and Peace

I think that there should be no hate in the world. Hate is what causes people to act violently and it is what causes all the evil in the world. For example, if you disliked a certain person for whatever reason, then you would purposely try to isolate them from group outings or from conversations. This could lead to the other person feeling extremely hurt and might possibly lead to a mutual hatred between the two people. In some extreme cases, this hatred could lead to physical blows from both parties which could cause possible injury to both parties, or in some rare cases, death. Hatred can also spread among peers. If you have a group of friends and tell them all the horrible things about why you hate a certain person; your friends could grow to hate this person as well without even meeting him or her. This could have a negative effect in the big picture because if an entire country dislikes another entire country, this could lead to war.

War is not a pleasant event because it causes the deaths of many innocent lives for the sake of a higher power. War is easy to declare; however, hard to fight. The people who declare war are leaders of the country; however, the people who fight in the war are normal civilians with families and lives. It may even be that the civilians don't hate the other country and the only reason that they're killing people from the other country is because the leader dislikes the other country for whatever reason. If everyone could just get along with each other, then there would be no, war, but there will be tensions which might eventually lead to war as the tensions get tighter. That's why it is not just good enough to tolerate each other but to get to know each other and to learn to like certain thing about everybody. This way hate won't spread from one person to a group of people and then eventually to an entire country where there would be a possibility of it turning into a war.

For people to learn to like each other, they should always think positively about each other. If they catch themselves realizing that they dislike someone for whatever reason, they should list 10 things that they like about that person instead. Also, to support world peace by making sure there is no hate in the world, people should also help advocate the idea of everyone liking each other in the world. If everyone helps spread this idea, it'll be sure to eventually eradicate war and hatred in the world. If hate is easily spread the world, why can't love be?