

I have to say that I've been feeling sort of out of it on the articles because I don't want anything. Aside from electronic toys or brand-name goods, no goal is lighting my fire. Sure, I'd like to something successful , or make my life happy, but somehow, it's not motivating me. Then I began opening my mind and I realized what was missing. I want to do something for others more than for myself. what I mean is that I'd like to find an organization or issue that I could really contribute to. Like being a mental health advocate for patients or maybe care for homeless animals. I realize this sounds so wishy-washy, but I think I'm on to something here. I think that's wonderful sometimes the greatest gift we can receive is being helpful to others. With no labels. So many of us are so caught up in ourselves we forget to take the time to check in on others and to lend a helping hand, that's where the divine intervention occurs. People helping people.

It feels good to make a difference in this world. I found a great little orphanage in Nepal that I donate to, but there are more hands-on ways to help living creatures. These ideas below are a little limited, but maybe the brainstormers here will come up with more. After that I am looking for how to help the homeless pets. I know that millions of pets are abandoned or left homeless every year. There is one way from many ways that I can help homeless pets. I can consider adopting a homeless pet myself. so now one of them staying in my home, in my family. I know that it's just a little point of my life, but its will be the good thing in the world if most of people open their mind and do something for this world.
