Every individual deserves to be treated well and has the right to be free. I think that it all what the human rights is about. We are all entitled of these rights from the time we existed. We all have it right to be not neglected by our parents and that enables us to be where we are at present. But we are very much fortunate to have our freedom be limited since it lives us security. Knowing people might beyond what can be described as humane, It is very fortunate for us having law implemented by our government to protect us from possible harms we can be put in.

It has quite been a bother to me though, especially every time I look into the newspaper, there is always an article about human rights violation. I am quite terrified by the gruesome killing reported on the news. People nowadays seem to grow even more and more aggressive and tend to disregard what tights each individual has despite all the laws. All the killings spread all over the news could bring chaos to the world. And even right now, it seems as if being blood-stained doesn't create that much guilt since violating the human rights seem to be a normal process and they have become quite an expert cleaning their status.

The acts which the violator has shown us may reflect what kind of environment he has grown from and I think it can be considered as a solution that would. If not totally-terminated; human rights, violation may be somehow reduced. And right now, it is up to the parents or guardians at home and teachers at school to shape the future generations into better citizens of our country.
