It is the rights given to the citizens of the Philippines and applied equally regardless of sexuality, age, possession in life (meaning to say rich and poor are alike) and provides punishment who ever intent to break these rights. Some of our rights are the following: the right to education, meaning each one of us has the right to send to school and it is the duty of the government to provide school, to also gain knowledge for the future benefit.

The right to live – the right given to us to live in this world and since God who gave us life the no one can take it away. The right to remain silent – it is the right given to accused or arrested person of any crime. The right to presumption of innocent, meaning to say the arresting police has no right to force the person to tell something about the crime. The right to be inform of the nature and cause of accusation it applies that the police officer must tell the arrested person if what offense has been committed and the police officer may be held criminally liable for the failure of informing this. We also have the right to bail (if the offense inailable), the right to due process of law, the right of suffrage, which means to participate in the election and vote. The right to counsel that means to provide a lawyer of our own and if the accused person can't afford to a lawyer, the government should provide one for him. The right to press, express and speech as long as we don't hurt others.

These rights are given by the government to its citizens and are applied equally. We have our own freewill and intelligence and that is subject that we are responsible for our own action. We have the knowledge to know what is right from wrong, and think of the possible consequences of our action. We are liable for our action.
