

HUMAN RIGHTS

Peras, Louie Resty C.
BS Criminology
Universidad de Zamboanga
Zamboanga City, Philippines

Human rights is the dignity of a person that no one can control except the law which have an authority to imply and control the behavior of a human person. And it is the right to every human person to have their own decision in life like; build their own family, the right to become a part as a productive citizen in our society, have free to do what they want in the improvement in their lives, and most of all have rights to state the truth.

Being a human there are many aspects to be considered that we are the one who build up our rights like: making our own decision, vision in ourselves towards what we want in the future, mission to be set in our individual characteristic in order to have peace in our society, have respect to our individual status in life. It means, give more value to other people's dignity which you can't hurt him in any other form or ways. Without human rights we can't consider our country as democratic form of government. The power of a democratic country comes from its people. The people dictate the way the government should work. By implementing the good status of the human rights, we have the right to obey in every law that the government wants us.