

POLICE AND MILITARY ABUSES

Kathleen A. Hamidon
BS Criminology
Universidad de Zamboanga
Zamboanga City, Philippines

I don't know much about military abuse but I think it's more or less the same with police abuse. Corruption, harassment, and salvage are the common abuses of rights we are familiar with. Sad to say, these are done by the people who are trusted to protect, maintain peace and order, and enforce law among us, the citizen whom they had sworn to serve with all their hearts and lives. Doing something as this unlawful is wrong and never be considered right or justified. Families, dreams, relationships, careers, and lives can be destroyed because of abusing the rights and privileges of certain higher positioned personnel. What I cannot comprehend is how their conscience could stand doing these things knowing such effects that other people would face. It's beyond selfish.

I know it would take a lot of courage and guts to fight these kinds of abuses, knowing that by doing so could endanger one's life and his family so I understand those people who just kept their silence. But then, this also means tolerating such acts, which is also like a little less the same with what they unlawfully do. Anyway, one could also help by recognizing and resisting temptation to gain once he is in such situation. Being honest, incorruptible and has a personal integrity are just few of the good qualities a police officer as well as military personnel should possess. If only all law enforcers have these qualities, our country would have been more developed and peaceful long years ago.