I've thought hard about the rights that every human being should have. Yes, any human being anywhere from Philippines. It doesn't matter what politics you follow or what kind of government you live under. We are human beings, period. So what are our human rights? After thinking hard and carefully, I've think the basic human rights that all human being deserve, yet in many parts of the world, it's not granted to them. Setting aside religious identity; your being a Muslim or a Christian or other infamous religious group or nationalistic pride, think about human rights through the perspective of a human being. Basic rights that all human beings should have, regardless of their gender, race, disability, ethnic background, faith, religion, or sexuality is "No human being should ever be made to feel disparaged or be treated in a harsh manner just because of the person's skin color, race, religion, ethnic identity, gender, sexuality, disability, or for their political beliefs". Nobody should have the right to treat others in a tacky manner for the reasons mentioned above and all human beings deserve dignity no matter what. Don't think how much you hate gay people or how you don't like black people nobody should be made to feel worthless just because they different from you. We're all human beings you think that person who's so different from you isn't just like you? Think again.

What man's responsibility in human society? While freedom gives man the right to make moral decision. The freedom of an individual is realized and upheld in his relations to other people in the form given to social life. Human rights are interdependent because the fulfillment or exercise of one cannot be had without the realization of the other, the respect of human rights.
