

PEACE IN OUR HEARTS

By: FELICIANO, CHARISSE S.

School of Allied Medicine
Universidad de Zamboanga
Zamboanga City, Philippines

Many interpretations of the concept are not overtly political, however. To some, world peace may simply mean the resolution of global and regional conflict through nonviolent means.

If peace is defined as the absence of hostility, violence and conflict, world peace would imply a worldwide end to violence and thus to institutions which rely on threats of violence to sustain their existence. It follows that there could be no law enforcement, because force is a form of conflict. Without law enforcement, there could be no laws, except those, which everyone voluntarily agrees to follow. Finally, there could be no governments of the type that rely on threats of violence to collect taxes, maintain their borders, or govern their citizens. Considered in this light, world peace goes beyond the cessation of nation-state warfare and calls for dramatic changes in most of the political institutions familiar to people worldwide.

If you looked world peace in a dictionary chances are it would say something about tranquility and nonviolence if you searched for a synonym it might even say a truce, I think world peace is far more than just a truce.

Once people start understanding each other, they would begin developing high viewpoints about the others. Respect and non-interference usually come automatically through understanding this were peace begins....

This is the most important thing to understand. Being polite and behaving well with others never hurts. Considering everyone equal should be the main aspect. God is one and all religions preach the same. In this fast developing world, a person does not have his own peace of mind; how is he supposed to contribute to the world peace? It is necessary to first have peace inside yourself and your home. This will naturally allow you to be serene and peaceful in the outside world too. Peace is something everyone wants, but no one exactly knows how to achieve it.... Someone has appropriately said, "Peace is the mother of progress". A country's condition can never improve if there are internal conflicts among its populace. Understanding and respect are extremely necessary to bring peace into the society.

Another important way of bringing harmony in the world is through educating people. Educated people make fewer conflicts and easily understand situations. Such people stay away from others' issues and concentrate on their daily activities. An empty mind is a room for bad and negative thoughts. Such negative thoughts direct people to the wrong paths. More and more arguments and clashes occur amid less or uneducated people because they do not have the sense to differentiate between right and wrong. Thus, educated people may also help achieve world peace.