Peace. We may probably find this word in an instant inside a dictionary but I doubt much if we can easily observe the existence of this within a large society. This is a large-scaled problem, lot of the world populace would reflect. And for certain, I do not have anything against the idea. In fact, I see it in an unvaried way. But I believe linking the word “large” does not stop us from continuously seeking the solution for this long-time crisis.

I can see that the idea of inverse compatibility among things seems to fit in the problem. What I mean is, if the word is somewhat “large”, why not incorporate the word “tiny”? If we tend to substitute the two descriptive remarks, then ‘large’ as the world community and the ‘tiny’ would mean as the basic unit of society—the individuals. And that would not exempt you neither me.

Enough with the blaming fingers pointing injudiciously toward the government or state leaders. They might be leaning on the huge role in this fight against conflict but they hold no control over the levels of misunderstanding especially among group of people having distinct beliefs.

But the question is, if not the government, then who is to be blamed?

It is us. War starts from our minds and eventually put into action. Our beliefs in our diversity drive us to deem that only on war we can alleviate the distinction. And this bogus principle has been applied though the passing years resulting the world today in its chaotic state.

But! Never say never. There is still a spacious room for change. A change in a form of promotion towards the foreseeable peace. All we need to do is act the soonest as possible. All of us must work in unison. Whoever you are, wherever you are and whatever you believe.

In my case, in my past student experience, I had been seeking for it even in the smallest way I can. I had engaged myself in student council in my high school days that looks after the welfare of the student body. I was once an agent of school regulatory body that aims in the constant harmonious relation among students.

And now I am in my 17th year of existence, and finding myself in college doorsteps, I am eager to promote a peaceful situation inside the campus. And whatever my capabilities and destiny may bring, I would ensure that it would not only be the benefit of mine but of all the students and the future incoming ones. Because I believe, the absence of war would mean a prompt progress in education. Let the war-prone areas like those of some Sulu provinces be an example. The continuous combat among those people concerned hinders the smooth flow of educational progress among children.

With enough knowledge based on organized education and simple experience, I hope time, consciously or unconsciously, would mold me into a productive citizen so that every scheme I may construct towards peace attainment would be close to feasibility.

I wish on one of the soonest days, with strategies on peace-promotions on hand, I can shout to the world on top of my voices that I CAN MAKE A DIFFERENCE.
