

Human Rights

Nurhaina A. Malali

Bachelor of Science in Nursing

School of Allied and Medicine

Universidad de Zamboanga

Human rights are becoming an increasingly globalized concept. In today's society, we see that many supra natural organizations are implementing universal measures and standards of human rights so as to ensure that no person is disadvantaged on the basis of their race, creed or religious beliefs. However, international experience has showed us that the existence of these international mechanisms does not necessarily amount to safeguard against human rights breaches. More often than not, those organizations can only intervene in certain prescribed circumstances.

Every human right has certain rights that should be protected including criminals but not necessarily protect them from what they have done. This is made to defend what is right and protect those who are in need and abused.