World peace is the unity of all nations and people; where there are no wars, conflicts and violent acts. World peace commonly refers to a permanent end to global and regional wars with the future conflicts resolved through non-violent means. Many theories as to how world peace could be achieved have been proposed. Some theory say that world peace is achievable when there are no longer conflicts over resources. For example, the resource of oil and its conflict over the supply is well known. Developing technology that utilizes reusable fuel source, world peace can be achieved.

But despite all those theories, why can't we still achieve world peace? Maybe people don't have the right understanding of what world peace really mean. I'm not saying that I know exactly what world peace means. As a college student, I say world peace is simply about respecting and understanding people. My idea of world peace is when the environment of people in this world has the ability to respect and understand, I think world peace is achieved. I know my idea is lame. But hey that's what I think. I am able to be at peace in everyone at my school because I have the ability to respect and understand the people around me. If only all of the people were like that, we can live in harmony with the world and there is a possibility that world peace is achieved, right?
