Everything changes and change is a constant phenomenon that increases and decreases with the flow of time. Everyone changes may be due to their personal desires or due to an outside force that promotes changes in our living. Change could be classified into two: a Good change, and a Bad change. Change can be determined, if it is a good one or a bad one by its intentions. For every actions relies on its intention.

Our environment now suffers from great change, and I think it is more of a bad change. Corruptions, lost homes, numerous casualties and crimes, unjust ruling, deprived rights, polluted environment I guess, polluted with criminals, corrupt politicians, unwanted human beings, unclean air, garbage and toxins. Who should be the one to blame in these deviant acts?

As what I've said, every action relies on its intentions and every action has a reward or consequences. We wanted to be rich, thus, we exploit our natural resources depleting it rapidly without allowing it to replenish, though we can hasten its recovery by helping our environment. Some politicians run as a leader to ensure a good future and to help their community to stand. BUT most of them run selfishly to attain power and money. We can see now the results of those actions with different intentions. High economy and good trade for the former and poor economy, deprived rights, poverty and many adverse effects plague the latter.

Who should we blame now? The leaders? The countrymen? Or both? For me it's both. The leader has the privilege to do good and the countrymen has the right to chose the right leader.
