HUMAN RIGHTS

Farhana J. Undang
School of Allied Medicine
Universidad de Zamboanga
Zamboanga City, Philippines

The right of property is one of the human rights. The right of the property is protected in the constitutions refers not only to the possession or the thing itself but also to the right over the thing. However, in the case of squatting, this kind of right may not be very effective because the settlement is not legal. It is wrong for others to think of injustice or partiality when the true owner wishes to make use of the property but the settlers are hesitant to leave the place. In as much as we want to play equality, the illegal settlers cannot be given due consideration simply because they don't have a place to stay. The right to equal protection of the laws means that all persons regardless of their circumstances in life, that is whether they are poor or rich, educated or illiterate, shall be treated equally before the law, or bar of justice everybody is equal. Both parties must be given the same amount of right and respect. Therefore, to attain peace among our people, respect each other rights and do not simply look one side of the situation.